When you first experience the mighty symbols of power of the Old Kingdom's Great Pyramids, there is no mistaking the magic and splendor of the ancient rulers evident at a glance. But those with lesser powers had their own symbols, whether working under a king for the state at large as local leaders and administrators, or provincial governors.

Join us as Ms. Jessica Tomkins, PhD. candidate in Egyptology at Brown University in Providence, Rhode Island, examines our modern understanding of ancient administrative practices and traces the expressions of power throughout Egypt. She received her BA in Ancient History and Egyptology from University College London in 2009, and a Master of Studies in Ancient Greek History from the University of Oxford in 2011. She has worked on the Giza Archives Project at Harvard, the Naukratis Project at the British Museum, and held a year-long internship in the Department of Egyptian Art at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.
